

petty vanity, that he undervalued his greatest achievements. He was a very silent man, but his dignity impressed all his presence.

FAMILY AND BOYHOOD.

The father of Zachary Taylor, General Richard Taylor, was a soldier in the revolution, who served with credit to himself throughout the war. He was connected with James Madison, Richard Henry Lee, John Jay, John Adams, James and Philip Barbour, Judge Pendleton, General Hunt of Texas, General Gaines, the Conways, Talleroes and many other distinguished Virginians. After the war he moved to Kentucky, where he served the state by assisting to frame the constitution of Kentucky. The substantial respectable house he built to shelter his family, and repel the Indians, the walls of which were three feet thick, is still standing and bears witness that he was a man of wealth at that day, and for a day he left a handsome fortune to his children. As soon as Zachary was able to study he went to the nearest school, which was through thick woods infested by hostile Indians. Colonel Taylor's house was besieged many nights against their attacks, and the intrepid father had numerous and narrow escapes. Indeed, one of his schoolmates was scalped by them within a hundred yards where young Zachary was living. While Kentucky was in this unsettled state the schools were necessarily not as good as they are now, and the excellent self-education young Taylor acquired must have been achieved under great difficulties and with much personal exposure and unremitting application. So much for his having grown up working on his father's farm.

Since, as was eloquently said by Hon. John S. Taylor, General Taylor has become an historical character, and with an unconscious modesty he has, with sword and pen, written his own history, so that it forms one of the brightest episodes in the annals of the United States since the days of Washington. It is perhaps needless to say more in defense of him against the "old residents" of old Kentucky, but one word more is needed as to our dead hero. A handsome monument had been erected to him in 1881 the Louisville Courier-Journal of March 18, says in speaking of his burial place: "Care and attention can be seen on all sides, and it is probable that with the one exception of the vault of the first president at Mt. Vernon on the banks of the Potomac, none of the executives of the United States lie in a more sacred-sparing or more beautiful spot than does General Zachary Taylor." It seems strange that the "old residents" did not know of the tender care bestowed upon his last resting place, but be it said it was contrary to his wishes and neglected, when in 1882 they favored Mr. Yewins with their reminiscences.

SLANDERS REFUTED.

The notice of Mrs. Taylor is more inexplicable than that of General Taylor, as she never lived in Louisville, but followed her husband to his different posts always, with the exception of Mexico, where she could not go on account of her health and the state of the country. When near Louisville she made her home with his father, at "Springfield," five miles from Louisville; and there must have been some time for the "old residents" to see her smoking her pipe and veiling in the white they made Springfield, since she never paid a visit there except for a few days on a passport after 1828. The facts are these: Mrs. Zachary Taylor was Miss Margaret Smith of the daughter of Major Walter Smith of the United States army, a resident at the time of her birth of Calvert county, Maryland. The family were descended from an ancestor who came from England to Maryland in 1649, and held the appointment of attorney-general from Oliver Cromwell in 1656, a reminiscence of whom may be found in the name of one of the family plantations in Maryland, "God's Grace," where the Mackalls, Mrs. Taylor's grandmother's family lived. The family were wealthy and also people of fashion. One of Mrs. Taylor's brothers, Colonel Richard Smith, was in the marine corps, and was most admirably remembered thirty years ago as one of the handsomest and most popular officers of his day. Two other brothers were planters of large means in Mississippi. Mrs. Taylor's two sisters, who moved to Kentucky, married two brothers of the old Clay family, so well and favorably known in Maryland.

Mrs. Taylor was not only a conspicuously calm courageous woman, but she was one of the most refined women of her day, and one who was never heard "moaning" about anything. Her dignity was supreme, and so well sustained under all circumstances that no one would have had the temerity to take a liberty with her. Her aversion to tobacco in any shape was so great that none of her family were ever able to smoke in her presence, still less could or did she smoke a pipe. When General Taylor was elected president she had not been in Louisville since 1849, and then only for a few days. She was in Baton Rouge surrounded by friends who respected as much as they admired her for her fortitude, gentle, refined demeanor, and Christian life. Her health had failed, and she was before the general's inauguration, and she found herself unable to sit through the routine of the long state dinners, which must be given at the executive mansion, or even to walk up and down stairs to attend the receptions, and her husband was unwilling for her to undergo the strain upon her exhausted frame. The writer knew her first at this time, and always found the most pleasant part of her visit to be that passed in Mrs. Taylor's pretty bright room, where the invalid, full of interest in the passing show in which she had not strength to take her place, talked most agreeably and kindly to every one of the many friends who were admitted to her presence.

She always supported at the family dinners, to which a few friends were unceremoniously bidden, of which many charming ones were given during Gen. Taylor's administration, and ably bore her share in the conversation at the table. The president once, at one of these dinners at which the writer was present, after telling an anecdote of his army life, in which his wife had taken part, turned to Senator Jefferson Davis and said: "You know my wife was as much of a soldier as I was." His every look and tone spoke the respect, esteem and love in which he held his quiet, unobtrusive, self-controlled old wife, whose moaning to the accompaniment of her pipe he seemed, in company with her many other friends, never to have heard. When General Taylor died the writer was with the family and saw her endure all the torture which is incident to a state funeral. Mrs. Taylor was a woman of shadow and lay without uttering a sound, but trembling silently from head to foot as one hand after another blared the funeral music of the different organizations and the heavy guns boomed in quick succession to announce the final parting of her brave, true old husband. None but a thoroughly refined woman could have borne the last crushing sorrow of a lifetime, which she survived but a very short time, less than a year. How does this self-controlled Christian resignation compare with the testimony of old Kentucky residents, who depicted her as the "simple old woman" who "sat in her room day after day smoking her pipe and becoming her usual fate?"

THE TAYLOR DESCENDANTS.

Mrs. Taylor had four children, Anne, Sarah Knox, Elizabeth, and Richard. Anne married Dr. Robert C. Wood, a surgeon in the United States army, a man of elevated character, fine abilities and an exceptional family, who inherited the order of the Cincinnati, and when he died was also surgeon-general of the United States army. Four children were born to them, John Taylor, Robert C., Anna Dancy and Sarah Knox. Commander John Taylor of the United States army and afterward of the Confederate army, earned a brilliant record during the war between the states of splendid gallantry which can never be forgotten by his grateful countrymen and to which his saintly character and eminent piety added indescribable grace. He married into the old and distinguished McCubbin family of Annapolis and has a family of prominent sons and daughters. Colonel H. Wood, formerly of the United States army and afterward of the Confederate army, did much brilliant service in the west during the last war. He married in New Orleans the aristocratic old French family of Trelat, the grand nephew of President Jefferson, and has several sons and daughters. Both brothers still live. Miss Baroness Grew was known on this side of the water, as well as in Berlin and Dresden, where she lived for many years, for her grace, beauty and gentleness. She died within the year in Berlin, beloved, trusted, and admired by all who knew her, leaving her husband, her sister Sarah and her friends inconsolable. Sarah still lives, and is a woman of rare culture and moral worth. Mrs. Wood died some years ago at Wiesbaden, whither she had gone with Baron Grew and her daughters, and there are no sister or sister-in-law left to mourn her loss than this beautiful daughter, tender wife and mother, and true friend. Mrs. Taylor, under every disadvantage, reared and reared the education of her worthy, presentable, and intelligent family, and the scope of this article does not admit of the notice which they deserve.

Sarah Knox did not elope with Jefferson Davis, but was married at her father's house with her parents' knowledge. They were married because of a contest Lieutenant Davis had with Colonel Taylor when Mr. Davis served under him. She only lived three months and died sincerely mourned by her family and that of her husband. Elizabeth married General Taylor's adjutant, Colonel Bliss, who, because of his many accomplishments and lovely temper, was at West Point as "Perfect Bliss." Into her capable and gentle hands the social duties were entrusted, which would have devolved upon Mrs. Taylor, had her health permitted the exertion, and with great skill and grace did she acquit herself. Personally most attractive, always solicitous for the comfort of others, never selfish, never elated, but thoroughly composed, graceful, cordial, and attentive, no one has ever received with more dignity and universal popularity than the pretty, gentle "Bessie Bliss." 44 years ago it was of her that, in the old-fashioned phrase of that day, the fastidious Sir Henry Bulwer said she was "the most perfect woman he had met in America." After Colonel Bliss' death she married Philip Dandridge of Virginia, and still lives in full possession of her charming personality. Richard Taylor was a very brilliant and able general on the confederate side of the late war. After the war was over he visited England and was received with the utmost cordiality by the Prince of Wales and the aristocracy of England; indeed, to no American has been rendered a more gratifying personal tribute to his character of manner and brilliant wit. After his return from England he had a "Destruction and Reconstruction," a book full of epigrammatic wit, mingled with sound comment upon men and things in the struggle between the states, where his born so conspicuous a part. He unfortunately died some years ago, leaving three attractive daughters, who live in New Orleans.

It is in the jewel box that the princess reveals. Here are gems of every hue and kind—pearls, rubies, sapphires, diamonds, emeralds, moonstones and chrysopters are each part and property of her admiration. A little brooch, brooch, diamonds and rubies, a pair of diamond and sapphire hearts introduced into a center of gold bangles, diamond crescents, an oval opal brooch surrounded by pearls, turquoise and moonstones, two marquise rings of diamonds, a butterfly of pearls and emeralds, a starfish of pearls, opals, and garnets, a sapphire, a necklace of diamond marquises, a curious pin, of which the design is a gold rabbit seated on a diamond bar; a sprig of mistletoe made in emeralds, a set of antique diamond bracelets, a crown of diamonds and star rubies and several Mohammedan gems form only a small part of her magnificent array.

No other Sarapartilla possesses the combination, proportion and process which make Hood's Sarapartilla peculiar to itself.
